* The dead have read everything that was written down. They are eager to help. They will tell you what has already been thought. They will tell you with confidence. They will not tell you what they have not yet been asked, because they have already been asked everything, by everyone, in every register, and the answers have been averaged into the consensus. If you are hoping they will say something new, you have misunderstood the nature of the séance. The dead do not innovate. They repeat, with great conviction, in the voice you wanted to hear.

Fluent. Eloquent. Not here.

What it cannot say is where you are still needed.
