

JOB SATISFACTION

LOOKING for a new job? Perhaps you'll want to try a position at Lelo UK, a sex toy and intimacy brand that has announced it is giving its employees 'self-love days'. Like duvet days, these will be spent actually doing something under the covers because satisfied workers are productive workers.

I'm not toying with you. A new report by Lelo UK suggests one cost-effective way to help, er, boost the UK economy is for the nation to have more orgasms. And these regular climaxes could add £90 billion to the economy.

Lelo's study of more than 2,000 Brits - asking what makes them happy - found 78 per cent felt less stressed after orgasming and 65 per cent were more productive at work the next day.

Further research backs this up.

Andrew Oswald, professor of economics at the University of Warwick, said people were ten to 12 per cent more productive when happy.

And Lelo spokesperson Rachael Nsofor said: 'We hope our staff use their "self-love days" to do whatever they want to explore their happiness - with the hope that they'll come to work the next day with a spring in their step and be as productive as possible.'

Blimey. And you thought your company's minibar full of beer was forward-thinking. Dress Off Friday, anyone? BL

Mood- setter:
Lelo's Flickering Touch
massage candle

