Employability Focus

In a recent report, British Council explored employer perceptions of overseas graduates returning to China. Based on a survey of 350 employers, the current research explores employer attitudes towards these returnees and their perception of the advantages and disadvantages they bring...

Skills

- The main soft skills demanded by employers in China are: teamwork, communication and presentation skills, interpersonal skills and problem-solving.
- The most common shortages in hard-skills are computer and IT skills, numerical skills and graphical design.

Overseas Degree

- Degree subjects most likely to be seen as extremely appealing by these employers include IT/computing, English/foreign languages and business or marketing.
- Both local and international companies value graduates with a foreign degree, especially overseas postgraduate degrees. This makes overseas graduates more likely to be hired into more senior positions (but the extent of the salary premium is limited for graduates with no prior work experience).

Advantages and Disadvantages

- Overall, employers saw overseas graduates as better than their local counterparts across a wide range of hard skills, with the strongest advantages in IT skills and digital marketing.
- Overseas graduates held even stronger advantage in languages and in soft skills such as creativity, interpersonal skills and communication.
- However, some employers said that local graduates had better hard skills in some areas, were easier to manage, and had better knowledge of the local market.
