An Introduction to Entrepreneurship

21st February, 12.30-5.00pm.

The Venture Centre, Warwick Science Park

The role of an academic is progressively stretching beyond the confines of the university. In addition to an increased focus on the real world application amongst the research councils, many academics are choosing to actively commercialise their research and expertise. This workshop will help researchers develop the skills to validate their own business ideas, introduce some of the steps required to develop new businesses and help them to work more effectively with partner firms outside of academia.

The purpose of this workshop is to raise awareness about the research undertaken within the Institute of Digital Health (IDH) and to create a network of biomedical engineering researchers within the university and National Health Service. The aim is to motivate a number of further collaborations between interested departments.

Communication and Impact for Female Early Career Researchers

An example of the development and impact opportunities that researcher-focused activities can offer.

In November 2012 LDC offered bursary places to enable research active staff to attend a residential course organised by the Warwick Centre for Analytical Science in January 2013. The bursaries were quickly taken up, and following the event we received feedback from the researchers on what they have learned and the impact they expect the course will have on their future career.

In the words of one of the researchers, "...I attended a Communication and Impact course that kick-started my year in the best possible way. The course exceeded my expectations by providing a greater hands on approach than I was ever expecting."

The sessions included training and practise in video presentation, writing press releases and making a radio programme at the BBC Studios.

"The key thing I learned ... was to think about the wider and different audiences (not just my peers) when communicating my research, by clearly stating why my research is relevant and interesting in short sentences. Since coming back, I have taken steps to write and speak with fewer jargons and hope to be writing press releases for my research findings soon." Jasmine Harvey

"The course was instructive, inspiring and interactive. I improved bit by bit on communicating my research topic with other group members. In the end I could attract my audiences and convince them that my research is very important, exciting and challenging." Ying Wang

"Overall, the course has shown me the number of good ideas I can have on the spot and the energy I get from talking to a wide range of fellow scientists, particularly when it is from such a supportive group of women." Sarah Payne

LDC and the researchers who attended would like to express their thanks to Professor Alison Rodger for organising an effective and fascinating course.
